Some Rochester volunteers helping Hurricane Katrina victims in the south, say they need your help. And so do the people from what many are calling the forgotten towns, those in Mississippi.

Volunteers with Humanity Outreach Partners Enterprise, HOPE, have been working at a feeding station otherwise known as "Tent City" near the Biloxi, Mississippi area. They serve between 2,500 and 4,000 people, three times a day.

With Rita approaching now, some volunteers have left. Coordinator Gael Orr says there's still a great need for monetary donations and volunteers in Mississippi.

"There's only so many resources, and things are just spread thin. And this is a time right now where we need volunteers, more than anytime in history, just because of the nature of how huge these disasters are, because it is the volunteers who are really running these programs down here," explained Orr.
